The recent reorganization of CIA, designed to strengthen its structure for planning, conducting, and evaluating psychological operations, is considered by the Agency to be the outstanding development during the quarter from the standpoint of its role in the national psychological effort. This reorganization has been accompanied by a detailed inventory of CIA's psychological assets, now being used for a country-by-country planning. A comprehensive reassessment of existing psychological activities has resulted in the termination of many which had proved ineffective for lack of capabilities or personnel or for other reasons.
